

1. The first part of the report is devoted to a general survey of the educational system in the country. It deals with the various levels of education, from primary to higher secondary, and the different types of institutions that provide these services. The report also discusses the role of the State in education and the extent to which it is responsible for providing a free and compulsory education for all.

2. The second part of the report is devoted to a detailed study of the primary education system. It examines the various aspects of primary education, including the curriculum, the teaching methods, and the facilities available in primary schools. The report also discusses the role of the State in primary education and the extent to which it is responsible for providing a free and compulsory education for all.

3. The third part of the report is devoted to a detailed study of the secondary education system. It examines the various aspects of secondary education, including the curriculum, the teaching methods, and the facilities available in secondary schools. The report also discusses the role of the State in secondary education and the extent to which it is responsible for providing a free and compulsory education for all.

4. The fourth part of the report is devoted to a detailed study of the higher secondary education system. It examines the various aspects of higher secondary education, including the curriculum, the teaching methods, and the facilities available in higher secondary schools. The report also discusses the role of the State in higher secondary education and the extent to which it is responsible for providing a free and compulsory education for all.

1. The first part of the report is devoted to a general survey of the educational system in the country. It deals with the various levels of education, from primary to higher secondary, and the different types of institutions that provide these services. The report also discusses the role of the State in education and the extent to which it is responsible for providing a free and compulsory education for all.

2. The second part of the report is devoted to a detailed study of the primary education system. It examines the various aspects of primary education, including the curriculum, the teaching methods, and the facilities available in primary schools. The report also discusses the role of the State in primary education and the extent to which it is responsible for providing a free and compulsory education for all.

3. The third part of the report is devoted to a detailed study of the secondary education system. It examines the various aspects of secondary education, including the curriculum, the teaching methods, and the facilities available in secondary schools. The report also discusses the role of the State in secondary education and the extent to which it is responsible for providing a free and compulsory education for all.

4. The fourth part of the report is devoted to a detailed study of the higher secondary education system. It examines the various aspects of higher secondary education, including the curriculum, the teaching methods, and the facilities available in higher secondary schools. The report also discusses the role of the State in higher secondary education and the extent to which it is responsible for providing a free and compulsory education for all.